Teacher Strikes Idle Students

Yesterday afternoon, during a seemingly normal art class, the teacher, Gertrude Fitzpatrick, struck a daydreaming student on the side of the head. We interviewed both the student and the teacher. This is what Fitzpatrick had to say about the event: "I find it incredibly annoying when a student is daydreaming in my class. All I ask is that they pay attention while I'm teaching. I think that maybe I could have reacted in a different way, instead of hitting the student, but it got the job done."

The student, Shelby Parker, said that she was thinking about what she was going to paint for her next project when she was struck by her teacher.

Shelby's parents, Maria and Steven Parker say that they are going to press charges, and that they hope that Fitzpatrick will be fired from her job, and banned from teaching.

We will bring you more information on this subject as the police investigate, and if court case is made.
